

Personal insurance when relocating

Protect yourself during, and after, your move

Relocating can be really stressful. You want to be sure that everything makes it to your destination safely and that it all stays safe in your new location. You can reduce this stress with the right insurance coverage for every step of the way.

Buy new homeowners or renters insurance – these policies are tied to a specific address so you'll need a new policy to match your new address. Note that it's wise to overlap your current and future policies so that your possessions are covered while in transit as well.

Change your address – visit your new city's Department of Motor Vehicles or Secretary of State Facility to get a new drivers license, update your vehicle registration, register to vote and more.

Update your auto insurance – your insurance company will need to know where you're doing most of your driving. Rates can vary by location so you could also financially benefit from updating these policies.

Check your health insurance – make sure that your coverage is still valid in your new location and take some time to find doctors and hospitals within your network before you need them.

Revisit your life insurance – inform your insurance company about any changes resulting from your relocation. For example, purchasing a new home or getting a raise.
